

A bachelor's degree program is an undergraduate program that usually takes four years to complete. Enrolling in a bachelor's degree program requires that students choose a major area of study, such as finance, history, communications or biology.

Religious studies programs examine faith communities from across the globe. Courses may explore the history of religions, similarities between faith groups and differences that contribute to international challenges. Through the prism of religion, student scholars examine the art, politics and economies of societies, observing how faith has influenced culture. Religious studies programs require high-level critical thinking and writing skills. As they advance, students may focus on a single aspect of the discipline culminating in the development of a thesis. That research may lead students down a particular path to further study or employment. A large part of the study of religion is the study of sacred texts. Often, study of those texts is best done in the original language. As such, several religious studies programs require proficiency in a second language, and there are often opportunities to study abroad through partner universities around the world. The University of Maryland, for example, fosters partnerships with programs on four continents.

Schools That Offer Associate in Accounting

A nonprofit, regionally accredited higher education institution, Pacific Oaks offers bachelor's completion and master's programs in a variety of fields, including Human Development, Marriage and Family Therapy (MFT), Education, Early Childhood Education (ECE), Teacher Credentialing, and Organizational Leadership.